The word everything comes up quite a lot in popular American literature and popular American usage. But, for the most part, it simply means "everything", which isn't terribly useful. But it also is a common noun, and I just wonder if it is supposed to be plural or singular. An example of the word "every thing" would be something like: "Yes, dear. I know what you mean. Everything is on my mind. It's such a terrible situation." Is it grammatically correct to say things like this? Is this an actual phrase? Or is it just a weird colloquialism for "everything"? I am kind of curious how it is actually used. A: M-W defines everything as a mass noun: Everything refers to the whole of the world or of a situation. Collins says that it is a count noun, although it also lists four other types of nouns, none of which refers to a count. It also notes that it is a mass noun: It is a mass noun: the plural form 'things' is also widely used, as in 'we want everything we can get'
